

“Colourful Sails of Pyramids” - Autobiography of Robin Drinkall

Overview

A Parallel Universe? Was it possible the 9/11 terrorist attacks in New York of 2001 triggered a response from a parallel universe on the other side of the World? The result of which lead US law enforcement towards the masterminds and uncovered something equally as shocking. A network of respectable and distinguished people linked to death and carnage for much of the 20th century. The autobiography “Colourful Sails of Pyramids” provides a unique and exclusive insight into the first 36 years of a persons life where impressions have been formed and stored as memories. It is an account of an accumulation of memories that reached a peak shortly after the new Millennium and led to a series of actions which the US Dept of Justice years later disclosed prevented a further attack on America.

Robin was born on 31 January 1965 and lived the first 10 years of his life in the rural Lancashire village of Preesall. He entered secondary school in Preston before college and Polytechnic in Leicester. At the age of 22 he received a regional award for entrepreneurship followed by other national awards before the age of 26. In 1995 he moved to Denmark with his Danish wife and worked a number of years at the United Nations Development Programme. In the year 2000 he started a digital health tech data company at Denmark’s leading Technological Institute. The new company succeeded in winnings contracts with some of the worlds largest pharmaceutical companies. It’s USP was the ability to capture data from patients with their medicines in real time. It was all revolutionary. The new start-up and entrepreneurial experiences are all explained in the book as well as the creation of a second start-up company in Cambridge, UK.

The autobiography of Robin Drinkall retells the unique entrepreneurial story in Cambridge between 2003 and 2004 and how a rogue agent of MI6 was discovered during the process. The book provides an insight into the psychology of entrepreneurship and a resolve to achieve goals during the business process from a life which seems to be a blend of Robert Ludlum’s “Holcroft Covenant” and Dan Brown’s “Da Vinci Code.” The only difference with the autobiography is that it’s true. The business association with the rogue MI6 agent slowly demonstrates the agent’s personality changes during the 14 months from January 2003 to March 2004. The changes in his personality were minuscule but alarming and yet had huge implications for the British State. The rogue MI6 agent is a central theme within the autobiography whilst there is also something else of intrigue recounted through the entrepreneurs childhood reflections. It is a reflection of distinct memories that keeps the reader curious and intrigued.

The entrepreneurial spirit is key to the success and survival of the Cambridge start-up project and is demonstrated by examples of thought processes and decisions that were taken to reduce risk. The overall time line of the Cambridge project includes a need for endurance, survival, intuitive thinking and an internal motivation to achieve a sense of Self Actualisation. The 14 months of entrepreneurial activity stirs various reflections of childhood memories that were caused through moments of curiosity and wonderment in trying to determine if the rogue MI6 agent had a prior knowledge of the entrepreneur from a time 35 years earlier. It also raises a question if so for what was the purpose? The climax of the Cambridge project ends with Cambridgeshire Police and statements of National Security linked to the death of Diana, Princess of Wales. The entrepreneur thereafter returns to Denmark and continues to build the Danish company. With his interest in another project in Copenhagen linked to Winston Churchill he starts to receive letters of support from the Prime Ministers of UK, Denmark, Australia and New Zealand and President George W. Bush as well as other known leaders including Baroness Thatcher and the Pol Roger family.

However, as time moves forward and as a closer examination of all the facts is carried out something far, far more alarming is uncovered. A numerical pattern threaded between events suggesting that a vast amount of planning has been involved in many of the atrocities. A detail that nobody has ever detected before.

Fast entrepreneurial actions, observation and steadfast resolve secured this story for future generations of entrepreneurs. Colourful Sails of Pyramids is the detailed account.
